COMING BACK WITH CAUTION

From production and commissioning perspectives, unsolicited and non-fiction screen content continued to effectively weather the disruption of the pandemic. Strong projects came from all corners and myriad genres, ranging from acclaimed docs such as Hulu's Summer of Soul and Apple TV's Billie Eilish: The World's a Little Blurry to categories such as food, with CNN's Stanley Tucci: Searching for Italy garnering raves, and established hits such as Fox's The Masked Singer and NBC's The Voice continuing to perform well. While there might not have been a Tiger King-sized phenomenon in 2021 (although there were more than enough derivatives of that series on various platforms), Framing Britney Spears (Hulu, FX) did seem to light up almost as many virtual watercooler conversations as Netflix's Squid Game. Still, ever-changing guidelines set in seemingly constant motion by the still-evolving pandemic didn't make production any less challenging in 2021, and the Omicron variant, rapidly picking up steam at press time, will most probably throw wrenches into shooting schedules as 2022 kicks off. "Long-term, there's a very healthy future for shiny floor," Wade told us in the summer of 2021. "Short-term, we might see a few more swings that live outside of the studio." And for other genres, the uncertainty promoted by a new variant means that creative approaches will remain key. For audiences who may be chomping at the bit for escape, perhaps that thirst can still be quenched in different ways. As chef, host and CEO of Intuitive Content Andrew Zimmern told us in June, pre-Omicron: "I can't wait to get going and travel 10,000 miles away to shoot an episode, but the real thing is being able to quantitatively prove to our buyers that there are a million travel stories that can be told closer to home."

recip! So, our approach was as someone would cook at home with a friend, or with your spouse, and whatever is around you use in your dish."

SAUTE — WITH UNIQUE TV SERIES

All of Pepin's iconic cooking series were produced out of KQED in San Francisco, which he considers his second home. The brilliance of Jacques' culinary career was making shows that were relatable to the audience. "There was Fat Food My Way, where I wanted to show people how to cook very simply," he recalled. "In Jacques Pepin Celebrates, I believe that it was much more classic cooking, really thorough, and special in that way. I did a show with my daughters, Cooking with Claudine, and Enore with Claudine, the idea was (in a sense), to have someone around who could ask me the questions that people would normally ask me if they could, and then I did a show that was totally on technique."

BLEND — AND PAY IT FORWARD

With all of his accomplishments, notoriety and knowledge, Pepin has never forgotten the less-privileged, taking his culinary artistry to heart by helping people get a fresh start. He explains, "My son-in-law is a chef, and he has created with my daughter, the Jacques Pepin Foundation. We try to work with soup kitchens in Rhode Island, New York, Seattle, etc., to establish a program on the basics, so people can get back into the world of cooking. Mostly, for disenfranchised people: people who come out of jail, addicts, veterans, etc. This is for all ages for kind of rejoin the working class."

SIFT — THROUGH THE CURRENT COOKING SHOW LANDSCAPE

When Pepin started his TV career back in the late '80s, he probably never expected the explosion of cooking series featuring a wealth of chefs, and the reality-competition format that has captured the fancy of cooking enthusiasts. Jacques weighs in: "I was told by a food historian there were 405 cooking shows on television, but there seem to be a billion of them! For me, the competition shows are fine, but when it comes to teaching cooking and yelling at people, especially young people, that's not the way you teach cooking. You put in a great deal of yourself and a great deal of love. That being said, when I was an apprentice at 13 years old, I got a kick in the behind, and yelled at too, but you know, I was 13 years old and you learn. The chef tells you to do this, and you never would have thought of saying 'Why?' because he would just say, 'I just told you.' I've been on Rachel Ray's show many times. I think she's very good, and she isn't pretentious. So, cooking like that with a friend is fun. We do that all of the time."

GARNISH — WITH MEMORIES

According to Jacques, cooking is more than just knowing your way around the kitchen. It's the experience, it's the memories, it's about family. "I've married for 53 years. We've been writing down in a book when people come to the house for dinner for 50 years," he reveals. "We write the menu on one side, and people sign on the other side. That's my whole life in a sense. I can see my mother-in-law in them, my two brothers, many friends, my daughter, etc. I can tell you what she ate on her 3rd birthday just by looking at it. It's a great way of registering a memory. I decided to do a book called Menus."
